"Before Brown, our segregated society was like a pond, its water darkened with pollution from separate, but equal stumps behind an earthen dam weakened by centuries of spillover from protests. The decision merely scraped off the top few inches allowing the dam to burst open. The exposed stumps have rotted away, and the citizens of this nation have rebuilt the dam with faith in the equality of all mankind. The pristine water is near the top. May Almighty God strengthen us in protecting the dam."

SYNOPSIS

This year marks the 50th anniversary of Brown v. Board of Education. The production Cross that River: Brown v. Board of Education celebrates this momentous decision that changed the face of America forever by ending segregation in our schools. The stories of the plaintiffs involved in the case and the dramatic re-enactment of the oral arguments gives the audience a greater understanding of the human face of Brown. Little Ruby Bridges, depicted in the famous Norman Rockwell painting The Problem We All Live With, is representative of the response in the South of the enforcement of the integration of schools.
